Introduction To Mentoring

When you opened this workbook, you made an important decision. You, and another person in your life, have decided to enter a mentoring relationship. This is a serious commitment—one that requires you and the other person to have some very frank conversations and clear understandings before you engage in this relationship.

What Is Mentoring?

Mentoring is a trusting relationship, formalized into a program of structured activities, that brings young people together with caring individuals who offer guidance, support, and encouragement aimed at developing the competence and character of the mentee. Across the country, youth mentoring continues to garner praise and to expand as a way of assisting youth in navigating the sometimes difficult transition to adulthood. The goal of youth mentoring is to help youth grow and develop in a positive way.

When presenting the concept of mentoring to youth, they described mentoring as “relationships”; when working alongside adults, however, youth perceived mentoring as an “activity.” Mentors and mentees should keep this in mind when working to define the type of relationship they want to have with each other.

When thinking about how to define the relationship between a mentee and a mentor, the concept of role-modeling often gets mentioned. The work of mentoring is different than role modeling.

“Role models are impressive and important figures in the distance. You can admire, emulate, respect, and almost worship such persons, but the role model does not necessarily have to know that you exist. Or, if they do, role models do not make a commitment to your development. Any aid they provide is by example, not by giving the student direct advice or providing recommendations for fellowships or jobs, spending time with the student discussing their work, or caring about the student as an individual.” (Williams, 2006)

The above definition does a good job of showing how a role model—and the relationship with a role model—differs from the relationship one has with a mentor. One is not better than the other, the relationship is just very different, with role models appearing off in the distance and mentors doing “on-the-ground” work.

Types of Mentoring Relationships
If you decide that a mentor is what you need, then you need to think about the type of mentoring relationship that you want. There are five main categories.

Traditional One-to-One Mentoring
A model of mentoring in which one adult is paired with one young person. Typically, there will be an extensive matching process to ensure a strong relationship, and it is expected that the commitment will be for one year or longer.

Peer Mentoring
A mentoring model in which peers from a shared or similar developmental stage provide support and advice to mentees. Peers can be close in age or farther apart, depending on the circumstances.

Group Mentoring
This form of mentoring matches one or more adults with a group of youth in a structured setting. This could include an individual or group of adult volunteers working with several youth in a school or a faith-based program, or a group of employees from one company working with students from a local school in a work-based mentoring program.

E-Mentoring
E-mentoring describes a contemporary model commonly used in schools in which one (or more) youth is matched with a mentor. The youth and mentor regularly exchange e-mail messages for a designated, prolonged period of time. In ideal circumstances, e-mentoring includes occasional face-to-face meetings to provide a more personal connection. In many instances, a program coordinator (often a teacher) will monitor all correspondence and meetings. (Paving the Road to Work, NCWD, 2005.)

Reverse Mentoring
This form of mentoring is where someone older or more experienced is mentored by someone younger or less experienced. Typically this is more likely to take place in the workplace, but there may be occasions for this to occur in social and educational settings.

Characteristics of Successful Mentoring Relationships
By and large, effective mentors are supportive, caring, and willing to assist their mentee with activities that support academic, career, social, or personal goals. Trust is crucial to all mentoring relationships. Youth in mentoring relationships are not as likely to connect with or trust someone who seeks to assume a parental role, tries to fix them, or who is judgmental or overly critical.

While mentoring takes many forms, there are four common characteristics around which mentoring programs should be organized.

Commitment
Mentors and mentees should make a long-term commitment (generally, at least a year).

Trust and Respect
Mentors should focus on building trust and respect with their mentees.

Expectations
Mentees and mentors should set high, clear, and fair expectations for themselves and their mentoring partner.

Communication
Mentors and mentees should meet or communicate with enough regularity to develop a strong relationship.

Face-to-Face Mentoring—
Mentors and mentees should meet at regular intervals for at least four hours per month for at least a year (MENTOR/National Mentoring Partnership, 2004).

E-mentoring—Mentors and mentees should plan on spending 30 to 45 minutes of online time each week for at least one school year (Institute on Community Integration, 2003, pg. 57).

How Is Mentoring Like Plotting a Course?
In this document we talk about a mentor using the metaphor of plotting a course. Why this comparison? Because transition from youth to adulthood can be complicated and confusing—and it can be especially hard when you’re receiving information from a variety of different sources.

A mentor, like a map, can help guide you through the chaos and help you figure out what you start and where you end up. A mentor can’t actually make decisions for you, but he or she can help you choose the best path for the journey you want to take. It’s also up to you to choose what to do with the information or guidance they give you. Sometimes you may not agree with the path a mentor will point to, and there’s nothing wrong with this. When this happens though, you may need to rethink what you’re trying to achieve and how you want to get there. A mentor can help guide you back to a bad decision and help you rethink what you were trying to do.

Table 1 (see pages 12–13) provides an overview of the mentoring framework and how each component of the mentoring relationship can help you plot the best course to reach your goals. Suggested activities are designed to help you and your mentor develop skills to meet your objectives every step of the way. If you have trouble figuring out what to do with your mentee or mentor, review the different types of activities that a mentoring relationship can engage in to get more ideas.
Why Should a Young Person Seek a Mentor?

A lot of young people don’t get much exposure to successful adults either in their field of interest, or just successful adults in general, who care about the development of today’s youth. A lot of people say “it’s as much about whom you know as about what you know!” and this is very true. Many worthwhile connections you make in your personal, professional, and social lives are a result of someone pointing out an opportunity or an available resource to you.

A mentor is also a great sounding board as you’re looking to make choices in your life that you could use advice or feedback on. A lot of times family members or friends may mean well and want to support you, but may not have the experience needed to help guide you to the right path.

Be clear about why you want a mentor. Are you starting a new job and want to be shown the ropes? Are you debating about which college to go to and need some good advice? Are you looking to gain some particular skills or abilities that you’ve observed someone else being really strong in? All of these are possible reasons you may be interested in getting a mentor.

Different Contexts, Different Mentors

It is important for both mentors and mentees to realize that not all the needs of a young person, with or without a disability, will likely be met by only one mentor. Based on pure personalities alone, a young person may find one person a better resource on school issues than another, or find that a mentor on career issues may not be the best person to go to when arguing with their parents.

In the context of a young person’s life, they’re sure to encounter adults with the potential to serve as a mentor in education settings, employment settings, or even in their social circles. Youth should think about mentors like a toolbox and be comfortable tapping different mentors expertise for different things. Whether it be one mentor who’s better at helping them work through school related issues and another one whose strength is in interpersonal relationships, friendships, and dating, neither one is considered less important or has less value. To be adequately prepared for the world of work and all that’s involved with growing up and moving on, a young person should feel as though they have a number of different mentors to whom they can turn.

Although no one mentor can solve all challenges youth face, effective mentors can help youth with disabilities in the following ways:

- Communicating with parents or other family members who do not recognize a youth’s emerging independence or who lack high expectations for the youth’s transition into adulthood
- Aiding in the improvement of academic skills
- Promoting opportunities for youth to explore career interests
- Improving and increasing socialization opportunities with their peers
- Providing information and guidance about how to navigate the adult service system.
What Is an Individualized Mentoring Plan?

An Individualized Mentoring Plan (IMP) is a tool for mentors and mentees to use together to help them talk about what they want to learn, what they want to gain, and how they want to grow because of their relationship. This plan is divided up into seven areas—Learning, Connecting, Thriving, Working, Leading, The Work of Mentoring, and The Disability Piece. Each area represents an important part of what we mean by youth development and youth leadership.

Some things to know about this Individual Mentoring Plan

✦ This plan is to be filled out by the mentor and mentee together!
✦ This plan is for a mentoring relationship of one year or more.
✦ This plan takes into account that no one mentor or single program should be expected to cover everything nor solve all the needs of young people, but NCLD/Y has chosen to be inclusive and cross-cutting in mapping things out.

Key Mentoring Plan Components

The plan is centered on three key components. The first is the Assessing piece, which helps mentees examine their own development in terms of youth development and leadership outcomes. The second step is about Actions. This piece guides the mentor and mentee in thinking about what actual activities and experiences they want to have to improve the mentee’s development. The third, and final, step is Accountability. How will mentors and mentees keep each other accountable for what they’re trying to do.

The actual content for this plan is based on a framework developed by the Forum for Youth Investment, which organizes youth development and leadership competencies and outcomes into the five areas described below—Learning, Connecting, Thriving, Working, and Leading. Youth development programs strive to provide supports, services, and opportunities that help youth, including youth with disabilities, achieve positive outcomes in all five of these areas. While youth leadership programs also help youth achieve positive outcomes in all five areas, they place more emphasis on developing competencies in the areas of Leading and Connecting. It’s important for mentors to realize that they can have an impact on all five of these areas.

Two additional leadership development areas in this plan—The Work of Mentoring and the The Disability Piece—are provided for brainstorming what else you may want to learn about as a youth with a disability and how you’re going to go about “Making It Happen!”

Learning

Positive basic and applied academic attitudes, skills, and behaviors characterize the area of development known as Learning (Ferber, Pittman, & Marshall, 2002). Often, development in this area is as simple as giving young people opportunities to use the skills they have acquired in school or other training programs, but in a different context. Youth should be encouraged to develop not only a higher aptitude for academic achievement, but also the ability to approach learning with a strategy for achieving success.

Connecting

Connecting refers to the development of positive social behaviors, skills, and attitudes (Ferber, Pittman, & Marshall, 2002). Relationships with elders, peers, supervisors, family, and other community members commonly influence these behaviors, skills, and attitudes. The level to which a young person has developed in this area will also dictate how he or she continues to build varied relationships later on in life. Further, maintaining these relationships in a way that will positively benefit the young person is the goal of this area of development.

Thriving

Attitudes, skills, and behaviors that are demonstrated by maintaining optimal physical and emotional wellbeing characterize the area of development known as Thriving (Ferber, Pittman, & Marshall, 2002). A young person must have the basic intellectual and social competencies to achieve success in adulthood, but he or she must also have the wherewithal to maintain his or her physical and emotional health at its highest level. This includes having the social and intellectual competencies to identify environments and situations that would potentially compromise physical health. The core of this area of development, however, is the ability to identify and access those situations that enhance individual physical and mental health. Thriving is the optimal relationship between physical and emotional wellbeing, as determined by each youth’s particular circumstances and range of abilities. Outcomes for this area of development range from obvious to obscure. Of the five areas of development, thriving may require the most individualized attention for youth in order for them to achieve successful outcomes. Since each youth brings different experiences to the program, his or her reactions to situational factors will vary. In addition, each youth will have different physical and emotional abilities and needs.

Working

Positive attitudes, skills, and behaviors around vocational direction characterize the area of development, which is known as Working (Ferber, Pittman, & Marshall, 2002). Young people should be actively involved in activities that will expose them to and offer them opportunities to practice the actual skills needed for a particular career as well as the work-readiness skills needed to find and maintain employment.

Leading

Leading is the area of development that centers on positive skills, attitudes, and behaviors around civic involvement and personal goal setting (Ferber, Pittman, & Marshall, 2002). Youth who are civically engaged in a positive manner, willing to participate in public activity, and able to navigate the civic arena are likely to become adults who participate in civic upkeep. In this case, the term civic can refer to an entire city, a neighborhood, a community, and anything else that implies public environs. Similarly, a youth who develops the inner strength and vision to set and meet goals will benefit not only himself or herself, but also his or her workplace as well as society as a whole. It is important to note that a young person is capable of showing leadership even without followers. Showing responsibility for oneself and demonstrating the ability to make personal change is often as critical as being able to lead a group of individuals or alter the larger community.
Once you’ve filled out your mentoring plan, you’re ready to start. Remember that good mentor–mentee relationships do not happen overnight. They take a lot of time and dedication from both sides. Communication is one of the most important pieces of this work. For a mentoring relationship to achieve all that it can, you and your mentor/mentee need to learn how best to work together. Here are some pointers for keeping your mentoring relationship effective.

Key Steps for Cultivating Effective Mentoring Relationships

These five actions are essential for ensuring an effective relationship with your mentor:

- Assess your needs
- Set specific goals and clarify expectations
- Focus on cultivating a relationship
- Seek opportunities to maintain contact
- Develop a mentoring network (Murrell, n.d.).

Just because you’ve completed the plan, doesn’t mean it was meant to collect dust on your shelf somewhere. Instead, see how you can continue to use this document in the future. Here are a number of different ways you can update the plan to make sure you reach your goals:

- Adjust the information you’ve put in this plan if you find that something is or isn’t working for you and your mentor.
- Refer to the plan if you find your mentoring relationship veering off track or if you feel like you need a tool to help hold yourself accountable.
- Show the plan to other supportive friends and adults in your life and let them in on your goals and ways that you’re trying to improve your own leadership development.

Also, don’t feel bad if your first official mentoring match doesn’t work out. A lot of times it takes mentees a few tries to find a mentor who can give them what they need. In some cases it happens in a formalized mentoring structure, for example, as part of a program in a community-based organization. In other cases a mentoring relationship may develop independently with someone you meet through a random encounter. If you’re open to learning and developing, other mentoring opportunities may present themselves.
